"Not necessarily, but it may be that we should lose a few districts in the South. There are many who believe a solid South naturally makes a solid North. On a tax and revenue reform policy we might lose disand revenue reform policy we might lose dis-tricts in the South, but we ought to make great gains in the West and Northwest, in New York and elsewhere of the North; and 1884 that our success would be assured. We should have the confidence of the country. We should not only gain a large mass of new blood, but we should shed a lot of sham ty for their own ends."

It cannot help but be so. The Democrat you quoted the other day was perfectly right in saying that we do not agree among o nelves on many important questions. But neither do the R-publicans; their differences are as great, and on many of the same ques The officers and crew will be distributed among different habitations, where they tions, as ours. But they sink all quarrels when election time comes and unite on one of the Republican leaders to-day dispoint. The Republican leaders to day dis-tike each other personally to a degree that might be fatal to them if it were not for their knowledge that they must stand to-gether or sink. On all the prominent questions which have come up in the present Congress, the Republicans have been di-vided as the Democrats were. Whenever we have sense enough to take up one tion, one important to the people, and make an aggressive, courageous fight on it, we shall win. The time, in my judgment, was never so favorable as now. But we must have a policy which means something more than merely getting into office. We must make up our minds to discuss tariff and the reform before the people in every district and by speech and print. We must attack the protectionists and tax-eaters everywhere with energy and with knowledge. The first monarch of the Bourboon line—Philip V—refused to with ness an auto da fc. A king, be said, when invited to be present at one, should only see a criminal to pardon him. General Hugo had risen from the ranks and was not learned in historic lore. He asked the Italian ecclesiastic to explain to him how it was that so infernal an institution became so powerful in Spain. In reply he was told that disboil in Spain in the heavens. Saturday and Sunday nights were grander than ever before winessed here. A col could not penetrate, and the old theological ideas about the damnable nature of false do trine, Torquemada was to be commended dry goods, are bankrupts."

Victor Hugo was a religious boy, and of a devotional habit. His mother was a Brit-tany Catholic, and he acquired her prejudices and beliefs. What he heard about the Inquisition had a terrible, soul-shaking eff-ct upon him. He did not sleep for many nights, for thinking about it; and it haunted mights, for thinking about it; and it haunted him in the day time. To quote his own words, he felt as if Torquewada stood between him and God. The painful feeling returned when he was adolescent. He never lost an opportunity of studying the history of Spain in the time of Ferdinand and Isabella. When he broke with the Roman washington Capital: "The Kev. To quote his own words, he felt as if Torquemada stood between him and God. The painful feeling bella. When he broke with the Boman Catholic Church and lecame a humanitarian Deist, he understood that kindness is the law of laws, and that if justice is not tempered with mercy it becomes injustice. To bring forth good fruits, conscience must be softened and enlightened by charity. The train of thoughts which Torquemada engendered had an outlet in Les Miscrables. "Javert," the policeman, is a reduced copy of the founder of the Inquisition, and "Bishop Myriel" is a modernized Francis de Paul.

Torquemada is a drama in verse. Whenever Victor Hugo goes far north he makes a fool of himself. In this work he never leaves the sunny south, which he understands. The versification is noble and its grandeur well sustained throughout. It is stands. The versification is noble and its grandeur well sustained throughout. It is not an acting tragedy. Its interest is physchological. The picturesque and dramatic elements are relegated to the background. In the form of a dialogue the questions of religious fanaticism and virtuous criminality are discussed. There are virtuous criminals, and Victor Hugo proves them to be the most dangerous. He also shows ous criminals, and Victor Hugo proves them to match, slouch hat and to be the most dangerous. He also shows them to be solitary and unhappy, for they are out of sympathy with the human race, and, indeed, with all creation. Torquemads, and, indeed, with all creation. Torquemada, Bloody Mary, Robespierre, St. Just, were virtuous criminals, and I dore say, there are persons who would range Guiteau in this category. Apropos of Torquemada, its author said to me: "The evolution of monstrous criminality is always slow. Bloody Mary's wickedness is explained by her grandmother's conversation with Torquemada. Isabella, we may be sure, recoiled from burning heretics and Jews when first advised to do so. Storms must have worked herself up to believe that Torquemada was right, and then excluded pity from her breast. Catherine of Aragon pity from her breast. It is impossible for him to exclude any human creature from God's mercy.
